Twilight tears spill onto the needles and into the small bundle of wrapped items, some of which have been cut apart by the boy. The room is darkened and quiet now. Twilight's not sure how much time has passed. She doesn't really know what has happened. All she knows is that the boy is gone. That now only she and the quiet wrapped items remain. There's a cracking noise coming from the forest floor behind her. One of the nearby trees gives an unsettling creak and she spins around to see the tree get splintered. A shadowy figure, an earth pony with black mane and tail, rushes into the yard with a sinister chuckle that makes Twilight's fur stand on end. The figure is already halfway to the barn, which is only twenty feet away, when it changes its course. She doesn't see where it goes, but it's clear that her hiding place is no longer safe. "Who's there?" Twilight whispers. She can't see much in the dark yard. Only a vague outline of the trees and the moonlight on the high windows on the barn. The trees creak again as the shadowy figure reaches the barn, and Twilight is sure that it is the same pony that was there earlier. It is just a whisper, but it is loud enough that the pony steps inside the barn. The shadowy figure is already in there, too. It creeps down the center of the barn, to where Twilight's hiding. Twilight can feel the pony's presence even though the pony's still a good twenty feet away. She could turn on the light and scare the pony away. She could yell for help. But she can't do that, not in front of the boy. And the pony is coming for her. "Who's there?" Twilight whispers. She'd rather not whisper at all, 2d92ce491b
